The purpose of this retrospective study is to analyse the clinical role of magnetic resonance angiography (MRA) in the assessment of patients with carotid artery disease who are candidates for carotid surgery. The angiographic findings of 115 consecutive patients with carotid artery stenosis (60 ipsilateral and 55 contralateral) were compared with the results of MRA. Based on the angiographic findings, carotid surgery was considered to be indicated in cases with arterial stenoses > 70%, plaque ulcerations, contralateral lesions and patients with an asymptomatic contralateral stenosis > 70%. A total of 20 patients (18%) were considered to be surgical candidates on the basis of angiographic findings alone, but 15 of them (75%) were considered to be inoperable after MRA. In particular, the evaluation of the status of the inflow vessels and of the patency of the anastomosis after carotid endarterectomy (CEA) were of great importance for the indication of surgery. Only 4 of the 20 patients considered to be surgical candidates on the basis of angiographic findings alone, turned out to be inoperable after MRA. In conclusion, the decision for car
